Health and Beauty

Obesity is defined as the presence of fat in the body beyond the amount necesary for the full physical and mental efficiency of the individual either during his normal activities or in emergency. Fat is stored, chiefly, in sub-cutaneous, intra-muscular, and perioneal tissues. Fats are mobilized and deposited in the body to produce heat.

Many people ignorantly suppose that fat people are in good health. The contrary is true. Obesity often indicates that the body suffers from deficient oxidation. The intestinal toxins and food poisons interfere with the burning of fat in the body in exactly the same way that a clogged furnace prevents the proper combustion of coal.

When there is too much fat, instead of performing its proper role in the body it interferes with the secretions of the ductless glands, which play such an important part in the metabolism of the system.

The chief causes of obesity are overeating, too little exercise, and poisons. Retention of water gives the appearance of obesity.

The treatment is reduced food intake. Exercise is important.

A very important thing to remember is that fat combustion takes place only when the quantity of food eaten is below the body needs. For this reason, the amount injected must be below that which is necessary to maintain the body weight.

This may be accomplished by systematically eating less, and especially by cutting down on sweets, fats and starches to the lowest amount that is consistent with health.

Nothing should be eaten between meals, Eat a sufficient amount of protective foods. Enough protein provided to meet the loss resulting from reduction of the total food, which can be achieved by eating plenty of raw salads and raw fruits.

Constipation can be overcome by a proper diet.

The weight tables that have been published are generally unreliable because every human being is a law unto himself.

Foods taken in excess of the body needs acts like a drug and produces a craving for more food. The discomfort which results when the food-drug is withdrawn will disappear, if the reduced diet is followed for several days. The torpor following a heavy dinner illustratee the toxic action of over-eating.
